DESCRIPTION

California's new indoor heat regulation requires employers to establish processes to comply with specific requirements for rest breaks, water, acclimatization, and more. In addition, employers must consider how the indoor heat regulation requirements will impact wage and hour compliance and how failure to comply adequately may lead to claims or class actions under the state's Private Attorneys General Act (PAGA) relating to reimbursement for personal protective equipment (PPE), break policies, and more. The new regulation may also require handbook revisions and impact employer obligations relating to requests for accommodations. Join this webinar for a deep dive into employer obligations under the new regulation.
